Antisemitism: Understanding Our Contemporary Moment

December's antisemitic terrorist attack in Sydney, Australia, targeting Jews celebrating Hanukkah, is a stark reminder of why these conversations matter. We're living through a moment when antisemitism is resurgent across the political spectrum, straining relationships, communities, and political alliances throughout the Jewish world.

Yet the way we speak about antisemitism often fails to capture the full complexity of the Jewish experience, particularly when it comes to racial identity. This isn't about finding easy answers or demanding uniformity. It's about building the language and understanding we need to navigate this moment with integrity and care for one another.

We need better conversations. Join us for three.

What we'll explore together:

- What does antisemitism look like today and historically?

- How does racial identity shape how Jews experience antisemitism?
- How can we speak about it accurately and compassionately, leaving space for nuance?
- What can we do about it, individually and collectively?
